Prizmah is an essential clearinghouse for the project of Jewish day school education in North America. My colleagues and I at Brandeis rely on its networks for connections with peers, for feedback on programs, and as a space to share ideas. We took a delegation of eight faculty and staff members to the most recent Prizmah conference in Denver, knowing that there would be important learning opportunities for classroom teachers and school administrators alike. It is a particular joy to be in a professional community where folks from so many different backgrounds and working in very different communities share similar goals.
